No Harm:

Do No Harm Stephen G. Ray, 2003 Among the evils addressed by Christian theology says Stephen Ray must be the evil perpetuated by its own well meant theologies His important project examines the downside of the category of social sin especially in theologians use of destructive stereotypes that have kept Christians from realizing and engaging the most pervasive social evils of our time racism and anti-Semitism To make his case Ray examines problematic ways in which several theologians describe the reality of social evil Theologians he contends often unwittingly describe social sin in terms that may themselves be profoundly racist sexist heterosexist anti-Semitic and classist He contends that they must attend more carefully to the social evils deeply embedded in their own patterns of language and thought Ray looks specifically to the work of Reinhold Niebuhr and Dietrich Bonhoeffer to document unintended consequences of theology's oversights and then to Augustine Luther and Calvin to analyze the strains and strengths of traditional notions Not only theologians and ethicists but also ministers and laity will benefit from Ray's thoughtful reconsideration of the social stance of Christian theology Do
