A fully cross-disciplinary volume (combining cognitive psychology, neuropsychology, linguistics, genetics, and speech, neuroanatomy, and clinical and positive psychology) and integrative conceptualization of all these elements. By examining the characteristics of learning disabilities and linguistic differences in writing, the book attempts to provide a unified framework. Neuropsychological aspects of dyslexia and other learning disabilities, which are discussed and put in context through a study of the characteristics of handwriting in dyslexia and other conditions of handwriting impairment, are presented. In addition, this study provides a new understanding and interpretation of the learning disabilities and the handwriting problems in terms of genetic factors and the handwriting and the writing process for dyslexia and other conditions for the handwriting.
