PSYCHIATRIC BREAKDOWN IN ADOLESCENCE: DIAGNOSIS AND PROGNOSIS

INTRODUCTION

ADOLESCENCE is a critical period in the development of many psychiatric illnesses, yet in this group, diagnosis is notoriously unreliable and prognostic indicators difficult to define. Boyd (1967) states that the admission rate of young people to our mental hospitals is steadily rising. In 1964 there were over 7,000 admissions and this represented 28 beds per million population. The trend has continued upwards.

In a leading article in the Lancet (1967) it was stated that 10% of children show emotional maladjustment by the age of 7, and at age 10, 6% had diagnosable psychiatric disorders.

Two difficulties, however, beset the worker in this field when attempting research. The first is that of terminology, and the second the age at which adolescence has been deemed by previous workers to begin and end.

Thus, for example, prior to 1933 the term behaviour disorder seems to have been used loosely to describe phenomena that the child exhibited in dealing with himself or others, and which created difficulty in adjustment—e.g. enuresis, aggression etc. (Wertz 1962). Braceland (1937), however, defined behaviour disorder as an undesirable character anomaly of a kind that rendered the patient unresponsive to ordinary educative methods. Blau (1952) considered behaviour disorders to be a subgroup of anxiety neurosis.

Some authors have attempted to delineate special syndromes in adolescence. For example, Warren & Cameron (1950) discuss what they term 'reactive psychosis' in adolescence. This is an episodic condition showing as anxiety, a drop in scholastic achievement, sleep disorder, motor restlessness, perplexity, speech disturbances, withdrawal and bizarre bodily sensations. The condition carried a good prognosis.

Similarly Masterson (1967) discusses the concept of 'adolescent turmoil', an adjustment reaction of adolescence used by various authors in their differential diagnosis of this group.

Turning to the question of defining the age range of adolescence, we again find a variety of views. Henderson, McCulloch and Philip (1967) in a survey of mental illness in Edinburgh, described a group of patients falling between the ages of 14-19. Sukhereva and Kogan (1933) had however taken an age limit of 14-17. Hall (1938) took an age group of 10-19, and Warren (1965) took a group between the ages of 11-19. Masterson and Washbourne (1966) took a group aged 12-18. Strictly speaking, therefore, none of these surveys are directly comparable and this makes the problem of incidence, and of differential diagnosis more difficult.

A final problem is to define a norm for adolescent behaviour since most trials have been carried out without a control group. Wilson (1960) has considered this problem, and states that 'normal' adolescents may show episodes of anxiety, depression, hysterical symptoms, aggressive or delinquent behaviour, mild paranoid reactions,
