Abstract

The frequency-tagging approach has generally been confined to study low-level sensory processes and always found related activation over the occipital region. Here for the first time, we investigated with it, high-level socio-cognitive functions, i.e. the processing of what other people are looking at which is referred to as level 1 visual perspective taking (VPT). Sixteen participants were presented with visual scenes alternating at 2.5 Hz which were depicting a person and an object in a room, while recording electrophysiological brain activity. The person orientation and object position changed at every stimulus but the person in the room always faced the object, except on every 5th stimulus. We found responses in the electroencephalography (EEG) spectrum exactly at the frequency corresponding to the presentation of the scenes where the person could not see the object, i.e. 0.5 Hz. While the 2.5 Hz stimulation rate response focused on typical medial occipital sites, the specific 0.5 Hz response was found mainly over a centro-parietal region. Besides a robust group effect, these responses were significant and quantifiable for most individual participants. Overall, these observations reveal a clear measure of level 1-VPT representation, highlighting the potential of EEG frequency-tagging to capture high-level socio-cognitive functions in the brain.

Introduction

Consider the visual scene displays shown in Figure 1A: which ones are the odd ones out? Answering this question requires considering not only the position of the person in the scene and the left/right location of the object in the scene, but the specific relationship between the two: in three of the visual scenes only, the person looks away from the object. The present study uses an original electrophysiological frequency-tagging approach to provide neural evidence for the rapid representation of this relationship between another person and what he or she is looking at, i.e. a basic visual perspective-taking (VPT) ability, without direct contamination by overt responses.

Considering another person's viewpoint plays a fundamental role in our everyday life social interactions. Amongst the various forms of perspective-taking we can engage in, processing what the other person is looking at is particularly important as it provides valuable information to make more complex social inferences, such as inferring what the other person likes, intends to do, or talks about, for example. This basic VPT ability is usually referred to as level 1 VPT (contrary to level 2 VPT which consists in establishing 'how' a stimulus is perceived by someone else (Flavell et al., 1986)). Level 1 VPT is one of the earliest developing forms of explicit perspective taking in children (Sodian et al., 2007) and it is a perspective-taking ability that higher primates such as chimpanzees might share with humans (Hare et al., 2000).

Human adults easily represent what another person can see when explicitly instructed to do so. Under certain circumstances, they also do it involuntarily. For example, Samson et al. (2002) asked participants to count how many dots they could see in a visual scene. A human avatar similar to those depicted in
