Abstract The purpose of this study was to examine the effects of a 6-week training program on the psychophysiological responses of young adults during a simulated military task. Twenty-four participants were randomly assigned to either a control or a training group. The control group performed the task without any training, while the training group received a 6-week training program consisting of physical and mental exercises. The results showed that the training group had significantly lower heart rate and blood pressure during the task compared to the control group. Additionally, the training group showed improved performance time and accuracy. These findings suggest that a 6-week training program can effectively reduce physiological stress and improve task performance in young adults.
