Introduction

In most developing countries, there is a disruption of the civil military equilibrium usually assumed in liberal democracies. In liberal tradition, the military is insulated from politics and subject to civilian control. In several developing countries, however, the military has not only intervened in the political process and overthrown the constitutional civilian authority, but it also often has established its supremacy over elected politicians. Even in those countries where the military has become almost a permanent feature of politics, military rule is still considered an aberration and symptomatic of a malfunctioning political system. In Nigeria, military rule was usually seen as a "rescue" operation necessary to save the country from civilian ineptitude. Military rule was not expected to last long; once the rescue operation was complete, the military should return to the barracks where they belonged and leave the governing to civilian politicians. The problem, however, was that although military officers accepted this rationale, military rule usually became self-sustaining.

Military interventions in politics are very common both in developing democratic or totalitarian regimes. There are various theories about the causes of military interventions; historical missionary, organizational format theory, custodian theory, and socio economic development theory. This paper aims to answer the question of "What theory is best to explain military intervention in Nigeria and the reasons for the theory."

What is Military Intervention?

Military intervention according to Fawole (1994) is defined as the conscious act of displacing and supplanting an existing political order, a government, by soldiers with the objective either of governing or influencing the political affairs of the country in particular direction determined largely by the interventionists themselves. It is directed at the political system of the state or its agents involving the threat or actual use of force to accomplish certain predetermined objectives which may be political, economic, social or even military.

Theories that explain Military Intervention in Politics

Explaining military interventions is not an easy task, because they are results of a complex mix of historical, political, economic, personal, military, social, ethnic, and cultural factors. Although some authors argue that military interventions are random phenomena unrelated to the structural characteristics of societies and international settings, many structural theories
