

three hundred items that may have functioned as stone lamps in the European Upper Paleolithic. Written in the austere, exhaustively meticulous style of French prehistorians, it is a useful and well-illustrated compendium of virtually everything we need to know about these objects. The approaches are archaeological, experimental, and comparative.

Of the lamps examined, virtually all come from France, with only a few known from Spain and Central Europe. Most are Magdalenian, though some are found in earlier phases (Aurignacian, Perigordian, Solutrean). The author sees two main types: "open circuit" (flat slabs), and "closed circuit" (those, sometimes natural, with cavities). Each type served a different purpose, she thinks. Several interesting experiments were carried out in analyzing, making, and using lamps. Through mass spectrometry and vapor-phase chromatography it was possible in some instances to identify the fatty acids of the animal fats (possibly cattle and pig) used in the prehistoric lamps. Photometric methods were used to measure the intensity of the light emitted, and temperatures also were calculated. The comparative study was based on a collection of Inuit lamps now in Paris. Apparently the prehistoric lamps were used for lighting, not for cooking. Contrary to common belief, there is no particular correlation with the deep, dark caves where paintings and engravings are found, though lamps sometimes are found in these cavities.

The Arthur Site: Settlement and Subsistence Structure at a Washita River Phase Village. ROBERT L. BROOKS, with plant identification and analysis by S. EILEEN GOLDBORER. Studies in Oklahoma's Past No. 15. Oklahoma Archeological Survey, Norman, 1987. xiv + 170 pp., figures, tables, references, appendix. $6.50 (paper).

Reviewed by Timothy K. Perttula, University of North Texas.

The Washita River phase is an important but poorly known Plains Village culture in the southern Plains of central Oklahoma. Brooks's monograph presents the results of salvage excavations conducted at the Arthur Site in 1982, when over 6,000 m² was stripped mechanically to recover settlement-pattern data from a Washita River phase village occupied ca. A.D. 1330-1380. Exposed in the buried occupational zone were well-preserved middens, storage pits, and seven rectangular houses that yielded a diverse material culture as well as a regionally important assemblage of plant and animal remains.

The site's short occupational span and contextual integrity readily lend themselves to a pioneer study of local Washita River phase social and economic behavior. Brooks focuses on the analysis of household-level activities, while placing those archaeological manifestations of activity groups that reflect individual and community behavior within an integrated research framework. Substantive results discussed concern issues such as architecture, chronology, demographics, subsistence strategies, spatial patterns of resource exploitation, and cultural and noncultural formation processes affecting the recognition of household-activity areas. Critical analyses of the empirical site catchment, and the character of the household assemblages, are used to begin realistically reconstructing the cultural patterns of these Plains Villagers. Brooks concludes that the Washita River phase represents a record of village farmers adapted to the extension of the Eastern Woodland lowland forest. The study is a significant and welcome contribution to understanding Plains Village adaptations in the southern Plains.

The Range Site: Archaic Through Late Woodland Occupations. JOHN E. KELLY, ANDREW C. FORTIER, STEVEN J. OZUK, and JOYCE A. WILLIAMS, with contributions by LUCRETIA KELLY, SISSEL JOHANNESEN, PAULA CROSS, and GEORGE MILNER. FAI-270 Reports Vol. 16. American Bottom Archaeology, University of Illinois Press, Urbana, 1987. xxx + 455 pp., tables, figures, plates, references. $23.95 (paper).

Reviewed by Charles W. Markman, Northern Illinois University.

This report is part of a continuing series of volumes that summarize site investigations conducted in advance of the construction of Federal Highway 270 (re-numbered 255) within the American Bottom. The route skirts Cahokia Mounds and runs through dozens of lesser sites. The Range site extended along a ridge for nearly 800 m and covered 10 ha, 70 percent of which lie within the right-of-way. Machine stripping conducted as part of the 1978 through 1981 field investigations revealed over 5,500 prehistoric features. Early Archaic through Oneota period artifacts were encountered.

Part I is an introductory section. Part II reports on the Archaic occupation. Over 50 percent of the diagnostic Archaic materials and 281 features are associated with the Late Archaic Prairie Lake phase (1000-600 B.C.). Interpretations of the Prairie Lake patterning are bolstered by comparisons with nearby sites where contemporary occupations are less disturbed by subsequent settlements. Part III is devoted to the Early and Middle Woodland occupations. Interpretations are limited as no features were encountered. Part IV, a discussion of the Late Woodland Patrick phase occupation, runs 305 pages. The Patrick phase is represented by a total of 1,872 features including 84 structures. The data are used to define constituent settlements and to arrange these in an approximate temporal sequence. Analysis of faunal and botanical remains provides evidence of a diverse diet with maize being an item of minor significance.

The volume is a clearly written and meticulous report of investigations at a site that provides considerable information on the cultural scenario just prior to the Mississippian emergence as well as a temporal perspective on earlier developments. Presumably reports on the later components—Emergent Mississippian through Oneota—are forthcoming in an anticipated sequel of four volumes on the Range site.
