Going Back to Zen Janine Vance, Janine is a huge proponent of gentle holistic and hospice care for everyone to replace the harsh treatment many of us typically receive in the real world. She was inspired to write this book after her father survived a 100 foot hang gliding fall in 1984 and while she served as his primary caregiver until he died in 2021 at the age of 90. How does one go from being an aerospace engineer to the limited physical mobility of a nine-month-year baby without falling into a deep depression? Sometimes it takes a lifestyle change. She credits the gentle philosophy they enjoyed together for his uplifted mood while recovering. We live in a world that glorifies and glamorizes whoever has the most money and whoever shines the most brightly. However, being a top dog is synonymous with happiness. The evidence suggests no. If so, the richest among us would be immune to humiliation, grief, depression, and anxiousness. These emotions are significant parts of the human condition regardless of age, economic status, religion, or background. Sometimes the higher we climb that corporate ladder, the more we fear the potential fall. When we are on the bottom rung, we can appreciate the ground below which houses our roots. Moreover, when forced to see from the ground up or the back alley, we are led to a transformational and fulfilling life. This evolution has led me back to my ethnic roots to recoup all it provides. This little keepsake book points out the value of life's simplest things. When life does not go as planned and we're hit with surprises, the solutions can be found in nature and ourselves. Use this little book when you've hit a troubling spot or are curious to see from a backward yet oh so progressive perspective.
