Abstract: The efforts to discover HIV therapeutics have continued since the first human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) infected patient was confirmed in the 1980s. Ten years later, the first HIV drug, zidovudine (AZT), targeting HIV reverse transcriptase, was developed. Meanwhile, scientists were enlightened to discover new drugs that target different HIV genes, like integrase, protease, and host receptors. Combination antiretroviral therapy (cART) is the most feasible medical intervention to suppress the virus in people with HIV (PWH) and control the epidemic. ART treatment has made HIV a chronic infection rather than a fatal disease, but ART does not eliminate latent reservoirs of HIV-1 from the host cells; strict and life-long adherence to ART is required for the therapy to be effective in patients. In this review, we first discussed the scientific history of conventional HIV drug discovery since scientists need to develop more and more drugs to solve drug-resistant issues and release the side effects. Then, we summarized the novel research technologies, like gene editing, applied to HIV treatment and their contributions to eliminating HIV as a complementary therapy.

1. Introduction

It has been four decades since the first human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) was identified as the pathogen that caused the disease of acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (AIDS) [1,2]. Since then, scientists have started working on HIV mechanisms and therapeutics. Until now, over thirty HIV drugs have been approved by the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) [3]. Based on their molecular mechanism and targets to each step of the viral life cycle, these drugs were classified into six different groups: (1) coreceptor inhibitors (CRIs) and (2) fusion inhibitors (FIs) targeting viral entry; (3) nucleoside reverse transcriptase inhibitors (NRTIs) and (4) non-nucleoside reverse transcriptase inhibitors (NNRTIs) targeting reverse transcription; (5) integrase strand transfer inhibitors (INSTIs) targeting viral integration; and (6) protease inhibitors (PIs) targeting viral maturation [4,5]. The first generation of drugs is all reverse transcriptase inhibitors, like the first HIV drug, zidovudine (3'-azido-3'-deoxythymidine, or AZT), which was approved by the FDA in 1987 [6,7]. However, AIDS lethality did not decrease until the advent of antiretroviral therapy (ART) in the middle 1990s, after the protease inhibitors were developed.

In general, ART is the combination of three or more drugs designed against at least two steps in the life cycle of the virus. People with HIV (PWH) should be treated with ART as soon as possible. Usually, the initial ART drugs should contain INSTIs, either first-generation INSTIs like raltegravir (RAL) and elvitegravir (EVG) or the second-generation INSTIs like dolutegravir (DLG) and bictegravir (BIC), to specifically block the viral DNA integrated into the host genome [8,9]. The clinical trial of ART showed that HIV viral replication was strongly suppressed, and the plasma viral load of PWH was significantly reduced to an undetectable level [10,11]. There are some clinical studies that demonstrated that no transmissions happened to the partners during condomless intercourse, no matter
