Using Conservative Information Extraction Robin Forsling,2020-12-17 Sensor networks consist of sensors e g radar and cameras and processing units e g estimators where in the former information extraction occurs and in the latter estimates are formed In decentralized estimation information extracted by sensors has been pre processed at an intermediate processing unit prior to arriving at an estimator Pre processing of information allows for the complexity of large systems and systems of systems to be significantly reduced and also makes the sensor network robust and flexible One of the main disadvantages of pre processing information is that information becomes correlated These correlations if not handled carefully potentially lead to underestimated uncertainties about the calculated estimates In conservative estimation the unknown correlations are handled by ensuring that the uncertainty about an estimate is not underestimated If this is ensured the estimate is said to be conservative Neglecting correlations means information is double counted which in worst case implies diverging estimates with fatal consequences While ensuring conservative estimates is the main goal it is desirable for a conservative estimator as for any estimator to provide an error covariance which is as small as possible Application areas where conservative estimation is relevant are setups where multiple agents cooperate to accomplish a common objective e g target tracking surveillance and air policing The first part of this thesis deals with theoretical matters where the conservative linear unbiased estimation problem is formalized This part proposes an extension of classical linear estimation theory to the conservative estimation problem The conservative linear unbiased estimator CLUE is suggested as a robust and practical alternative for estimation problems where the correlations are unknown Optimality criteria for the CLUE are provided and further investigated It is shown that finding an optimal CLUE is more complicated than finding an optimal linear unbiased estimator in the classical version of the problem To simplify the problem a CLUE that is optimal under certain restrictions will also be investigated The latter is named restricted best CLUE An important result is a theorem that gives a closed form solution to a restricted best CLUE Furthermore several conservative estimation methods are described followed by an analysis of their properties The methods are shown to be conservative and optimal under different assumptions about the underlying correlations The second part of the thesis focuses on practical aspects of the conservative approach to decentralized estimation in configurations where the communication channel is constrained The diagonal covariance approximation is proposed as a data reduction technique that complies with the communication constraints and if handled correctly can be shown to preserve conservative estimates Several information selection methods are derived that can reduce the amount of data being transmitted in the communication channel Using the information selection methods it is possible to decide what information other actors of the sensor network find useful
