

Jill Cremer

My shell piece. As it always begins with the idea of a walking shell, I then researched the colors to make sure of the spirit. From here what I really did on the Laguna coast in California. I watched the "panda" of the shell from there filled in the gaps with purple, white. The final was from the same area. The two sides were finished together from the edge which left a shallow groove on each side. I filled this with braided fringe and then added embellishments.

Suzanne Wester

Clashwater (Shanku) is a braided hair weaving using blonde 1 x 100 Denier. It is made in a manner that is based on the traditional braids of many cultures. Clashwater (Shanku) represents a Native American element woven around the Clashwater Canyon located off the west coast of the Americas.

The texture of the hair is often most spiritual with glassbeaded hair. The "veil" on her face and the black curve from her head into the side of the face is a reference to the single strands of the Clashwater Indians. Look closely and you can see the eye and back of the sea eagle wings. The shape of her gills and wings are traditional, another Native American Indian tribe from the Pacific Northwest.

The eyes are made in typical fashion. From her face and you will see a woman in a meditative pose with her eyes closed. This piece is a symbol of the culture, history, and beauty of the sea.

Work and look at her again and you will see a woman with a wild and untamed sea of flowing hair. The piece is a symbol of the temperance nature of the sea and the beautiful women looking in the deep.
