

these are faults in the right direction; and the book can be read with profit by those with less knowledge of algebra and analysis than is to be found in the second year work of the normal Honours course. It contains a number of interesting applications of the ideas which are developed to classical analysis and should be useful to readers able to read German and wishing to acquire the elements of this subject.

Structure of Language and its Mathematical Aspects. Edited by R. JAKOBSON. Proceedings of Symposia in Applied Mathematics, Vol. XII. Pp. vi + 279. $7.80. 1961. (American Mathematical Society, Providence)

Hadamard has said that linguistics is a bridge between mathematics and the humanities and, although this remark was made nearly 20 years ago, it has gained, rather than lost, its force during the intervening period.

The great interest in mathematical linguistics, at the present time, is generated by the pressure of the increasing backlog of "foreign" scientific papers which are required reading before any research can be started. The American and Russian governments are well aware of this fact, and it is because of this that so much effort is devoted to mechanical linguistics in those countries.

In this volume under review, the papers presented by a number of leading workers at a symposium organised by the American Mathematical Society are reproduced. These fall into three main groups: Applications of logical analysis, Machine programming, and aspects of linguistic representation.

Of the first group particular mention may be made of the papers by W. V. Quine on Logic as a Source of Syntactical Insights, and by Noam Chomsky, on the notion of "rules" in grammar. The importance of the papers lies in the essential difference in approach between that of a master of mathematical logic and that of a modern information theorist. There are nine other papers in this category which are all of considerable interest but of which space does not allow detailed description. One paper, however, must be mentioned: it is by V. H. Yngve on the depth hypothesis. Yngve's suggestion that languages are arranged to be self limiting in "depth" because of the psychological observation that many humans can remember only about 7 random digits, or nonsense syllables, at one hearing has aroused great discussion and interest. His paper in this symposium forms the clearest exposition of the idea which has yet appeared and it will be read with interest by all workers in the field.

For the computer programmer, the most important paper is that by A. G. Oettinger on automatic syntactic analysis. This is related to a particular type of storage medium but the techniques described are of general utility.

In the field of representation there are several interesting papers. Y. R. Chao attempts an analysis of the nature of spoken and written
