Nabokov's major writings exploring the tensions, fissures and failures in Nabokov's attempts to assert aesthetic control over historical time. In reading his response to the rise of totalitarianism, the Holocaust and Cold War, Norman redresses the commonly expressed admiration for Nabokov's heroic resistance to history by suggesting the ethical, aesthetic and political costs of reading and writing in its denial. This book offers a rethinking of Nabokov's location in literary history, the ideological impulses which inform his fiction and the importance of temporal aesthetics in negotiating the matrices of modernism.
