Binyon's first published work was Persephone in 1890. As a poet, his output was not prodigious and in the main the volumes he did publish were slim. But his reputation was of the highest order. When the Poet Laureate Alfred Austin died in 1913, Binyon was considered alongside Thomas Hardy and Rudyard Kipling for the post which was given to Robert Bridges. Binyon played a pivotal role in helping to establish the modernist School of poetry and introduced imagist poets such as Ezra Pound, Richard Aldington, and H.D. Hilda Doolittle to East Asian visual art and literature. Most of his career was spent at The British Museum where he produced many books particularly centering on the art of the Far East. Moved and shaken by the onset of the World War I and its military tactics of young men slaughtered to hold or gain a few yards of shell, shocked and mud, Binyon wrote his seminal poem For the Fallen. It became an instant classic turning moments of great loss into a National and human tribute. After the war he returned to the British Museum and wrote numerous books on art, especially on William Blake, Persian and Japanese art. In 1931 his two-volume Collected Poems appeared and in 1933 he retired from the British Museum. Between 1933 and 1943 Binyon published his acclaimed translation of Dante's Divine Comedy in an English version of terza rima. During the Second World War Binyon wrote another poetic masterpiece The Burning of the Leaves about the London Blitz. Robert Laurence Binyon died in Dunedin Nursing Home, Bath Road, Reading, on March 10th 1943, after undergoing an operation.
