Historical Fictions and Hellenistic Jewish Identity Sara Raup Johnson, 2005-02-09 In this thoughtful and penetrating study Sara Raup Johnson investigates the creation of historical fictions in a wide range of Hellenistic Jewish texts Surveying so called Jewish novels including the Letter of Aristeas 2 Maccabees Esther Daniel Judith Tobit Josephus s account of Alexander s visit to Jerusalem and of the Tobiads Artapanus and Joseph and Aseneth she demonstrates that the use of historical fiction in these texts does not constitute a uniform genre Instead it cuts across all boundaries of language provenance genre and even purpose Johnson argues that each author uses historical fiction to construct a particular model of Hellenistic Jewish identity through the reinvention of the past The models of identity differ but all seek to explore relations between Jews and the wider non Jewish world The author goes on to present a focal in depth analysis of one text Third Maccabees Maintaining that this is a late Hellenistic not a Roman work Johnson traces important themes in Third Maccabees within a broader literary context She evaluates the evidence for the authorship audience and purpose of the work and analyzes the historicity of the persecution described in the narrative Illustrating how the author reinvents history in order to construct his own model for life in the diaspora Johnson weighs the attitudes and stances from defiance to assimilation of this crucial period
