Congress. House. Committee on Ways and Means. Subcommittee on Health, 1994 National Health Insurance by Regulation Charles E. Phelps, 1980 Social issues have often been solved at least in part by requiring that certain activities be undertaken by businesses on behalf of their employees The entire social security system workmen's compensation plans and affirmative action for hiring of minorities are cases in point The concept of using mandating as a portion of a national health insurance NHI plan arose during the Nixon administration and has been periodically though not necessarily currently embraced by such diverse entities as the administrations of Presidents Nixon and Carter the U S Chamber of Commerce and prominent members of Congress of a variety of political persuasions from both major political parties The broad political appeal for using mandated insurance appears to arise from several roots First it is off budget That is a national health insurance plan can be structured without giving the appearance of affecting federal spending Second it gains the political support of a potentially powerful interest group Because it retains an active role for the private insurance industry it retains a market oriented structure generally appealing to those desiring to minimize the appearance of government intervention
