Nationalism and the Making of a Professional Historian Shih-chieh Su, 2014 This new study re-examines the relationship between the beginnings of the modern historical profession and the emergence of the nation state in the nineteenth century. The monograph analyses the founding father of modern historiography Leopold von Ranke and his evolution as an historian, his self-perception and his increasingly dominant perceptions of the historian's craft and role in society and politics. Su particularly focuses on the tension between a commitment to an objective representation of the past and the allegiance to a nation. The approach suggests an original and important revision of the conventional view of Ranke as an historian and perhaps more importantly of the origins of the modern historical profession. This revision also suggests that some of the conventional attacks on the alleged fixation on objectivity of the Rankean school were misplaced on the one hand and that on the other hand the historical profession has been from its very beginnings locked in battle with itself over its relationship with a specific nation, culture and race, its claim of universal meaning and implication and its assertion of truthfully telling the story of the past. Su demonstrates that many if not in one way or the other all of the dilemmas and conundrums that confront historians today were already present in the making of the profession and more or less clearly in the minds of such major figures as von Ranke.

The Plain and Noble Garb of Truth Eileen K. Cheng, 2008 American historians of the early national period argues Eileen Ka May Cheng grappled with objectivity, professionalism and other modern issues to a greater degree than their successors in later generations acknowledge. Her extensive readings of antebellum historians show that by the 1820s a small but influential group of practitioners had begun to develop many of the doctrines and concerns that undergird contemporary historical practice. The Plain and Noble Garb of Truth challenges the entrenched notion that America's first generations of historians were romantics or propagandists for a struggling young nation. Cheng engages with the works of well-known early national historians like George Bancroft, William Prescott and David Ramsay, such lesser-known figures as Jared Sparks and Lorenzo Sabine and leading political and intellectual elites of the day including Francis Bowen and Charles Francis Adams. She shows that their work, which focused on the American Revolution, was often nuanced and surprisingly sympathetic in its treatment of American Indians and loyalists. She also demonstrates how the rise of the novel contributed to the emergence of history as an autonomous discipline, arguing that paradoxically early national historians at once described truth in opposition to the novel and were influenced by the novel in their understanding of truth. Modern historians should recognize that the discipline of history is itself a product of history, says Cheng. By taking seriously a group of too often dismissed historians, she challenges contemporary historians to examine some ahistorical aspects of the way they understand their own discipline.
