

This "Precious Dust"

When the Battle of Stones River ended on January 3, 1862, more than 20,000 Union and Confederate soldiers lay dead. Most were buried in hastily prepared graves on the battlefield. In December, 1862, soldiers from the 10th United Maine Cavalry began the arduous and gruesome task of disintering the bodies of the Union soldiers and reburial them here in newly opened Stones River National Cemetery.

By April 1863 what Captain William Farnsworth called "the precious dust" of more than 10,000 soldiers had been brought here for reburial. Included were not only soldiers killed at Stones River, but others who had died elsewhere in Middle Tennessee. Of these, 1,400 are unknown. The Confederates died, not unlike the Union, in scattered locations, were taken to their home towns or to public cemeteries in nearby Massachusetts.

Captain William Farnsworth left his command of the 10th Maine Cavalry to command the 10th Maine Cavalry in 1862. He was killed at Stones River on January 3, 1862. He was buried in the 10th Maine Cavalry Cemetery in 1862. He was reburied in the 10th Maine Cavalry Cemetery in 1863.

[These were] men who had given their lives for the cause, eager to strike the death blow to the rebellion. Now they are cheering as they passed to the front, where they fell in the midst of the grand old Army of the Union, and here they lie, in the green sod of our beautiful cemetery, in the shadow of the hills of Stones River.
