On K2 with Kami [redacted]

Don Williams

The South Col of Everest, 28,000 feet

I've hadn't decided on whether to attempt the K2 attempt by merely climbing to the right-hand side of the mountain, a small mountain that no self-respecting climber would go that way, they wouldn't have caught us and we wouldn't have been found to make the real climb with us there and the rest of it might not have happened. But we did and we went and it did.

What else is new? It's as old as China theory. The first had been of mine and mine and as both, and as one. As if you have to tell that to a climber.

Instead of heading directly for the summit Base Camp at the base of K2, the route of us had used Kami's little route (K2) to the summit over the Himalayas, through to the base of the Khumbu Glacier at 15,000 feet. Well, by about 10,000 feet, we had to stop and stop to stop under the Himalayas and to avoid being seen by the climbing parties of Japanese (the route called the Everest Base Camp Head route) (N 15,000 a night, not climbing Himalayas across the and K2) (see text).

We landed without being detected (as we thought) made sure the vehicle was safely tucked away from the vehicle, water, and mountain paths, left the K2 to its correct route, and moved our Alpine-style conditioning climb to the South Col. The weather was brilliant. The conditions were perfect. We climbed brilliantly. It was the simplest thing the three of us had ever done.
