

1c What does “audience” mean for writing?

Your audience consists of everyone who will read your writing. Thinking like a writer about audience means figuring out how to successfully reach your audience in various kinds of situations. For example, papers that you write for a history course differ in form and style from lab reports that you write in biology, and both differ from memos that you write on the job, letters that you write to a newspaper editor, or e-mails that you write to a friend. Effective writers know they need to adjust their writing for different tasks and audiences.

After college, your audiences are likely to be readers of your business, professional, and public writing (Chapters 40–43). In college, you’ll surely address a mix of audience types that expect to read ACADEMIC WRITING. Here’s a list of categories of those audiences, each of which is detailed in the section listed in parentheses.

- Your peers (1c.1)
- Your general audiences (1c.2)
- Your specialist audiences (who are much like your business audiences)
