Abstract: In news reporting, legitimising discourse is usually present in subtle and implicit ways, potentially influencing people's social cognition and decision making. Based on Cap's convergence theory, this paper examines the legitimising discourse strategies in the Washington Post's coverage of the Federal Reserve's bailout policy. Through the integration and analysis of the three dimensions of the corpus, it is found that temporal convergence aims to link future presuppositions with present events, highlighting the Federal Reserve's large role in solving the subprime mortgage crisis, in order to construct the legitimacy of the act. Spatial convergence, on the other hand, highlights the negative impact of the external entity represented by the NFIs on the internal entity represented by the US and the positive impact of the measures taken by the internal entity, thus paving the way for arguing the legitimacy of one's own discourses and behaviours. Value convergence, on the other hand, demonstrates the potential for ideological conflict to be transformed into actual conflict by showing the clash of values and ideologies between external and internal entities in the discursive space. The study of convergence theory in this paper contributes to the construction and interpretation of the legitimisation of political discourse and, at the same time, to some extent provides a reference for subsequent research on convergence and legitimisation theory.

1 Introduction

In 2007, the US financial system was hit by an unprecedented shock with the collapse of the real estate market and the outbreak of the subprime mortgage crisis. In early 2008, the US Federal Reserve (hereafter referred to as the Fed) stabilised the financial market through a variety of means, including interest rate cuts and asset purchases, and also took some unconventional measures, such as quantitative easing, i.e. increasing the money supply to stimulate economic growth and ease pressure on financial markets. While the US has had many negative effects in reversing the financial crisis, its construction of legitimacy in political discourse has attracted widespread attention. In its coverage of the event, the Washington Post used various discursive strategies to legitimise its goals, actions and policies, and to find grand excuses for illegitimate US actions.

At the beginning of the 21st century, Piotr Cap proposed convergence theory, which is cognitively oriented and looks at the process of interpreting discourses and critical discourse analysis through multiple channels. [1][2] Based on convergence theory and the STA analysis model, Wang Yuxia studied the strategic reports issued by the US government against China, and the analysis found that they promoted the construction of political legitimacy of the US government at that time through the use of convergence strategies. [3]

This study finds that there is already a theoretical framework for foreign research in this discipline, but domestic research in this area started later than abroad, focusing mainly on the specific core discourse strategies used in specific discourse pieces, but lacking the study of the specific social background, international dynamics, value concepts and realpolitik contexts embedded behind them. With reference to these research directions and shortcomings, this study takes the news coverage of the Fed's bailout policy in the Washington Post as an example corpus and conducts innovative research on this topic.
