

or for China as a whole. The author uses a simple "before and after" system to analyze the SEZs in Shenzhen, Zhuhai, Shantou, Xiamen and Hainan. Key indicators are the level of foreign investment; changes in living standards; foreign currency earnings; and transfer of technology and management expertise. Data were gathered through first-hand interviews on-site, and a thorough survey of the official statistics.

The author concludes that there has been remarkable social and economic change in the zones. For instance in Hainan SEZ, employment increased 369% (p. 78). Also, Shenzhen's income was 52 times higher in 1989 than in 1979, foreign currency earnings increased 4.1 times, and the average yearly wage increased 5.8 times. These zones were successful in fostering closer relations with Hong Kong, Macao and Taiwan investors, and the average monthly wage of workers in the SEZs is between two and three times higher than in other areas of China.

However, the study also identifies problems within the zones, such as the lack of technology transfer, increase in worker exploitation and illegal trade. Park concludes that it is too early to evaluate the impact the zones have on China as a whole, but argues that the Chinese government appears sufficiently satisfied with the experiment to continue with the program. This is borne out by the fact that in 1998, other regions were also awarded SEZ status.

The key strength of this monograph is, without doubt, the richness of the data. The author visited several zones gathering information from both workers and management, often eliciting opinions and views not reflected in government reports. The book also has several limitations, however. The author does not compare China's progress in promoting foreign direct investment and industrialization with other export-processing zones in countries such as Mexico, Ireland or even South Korea. Also, the author's conclusion that there was a rise in living standards within the SEZs, based on the increased ability of workers to purchase sewing machines, wrist watches, color televisions, and so on, is, at best, contentious. Consumerism is not identical to economic development. Finally, although the author explicitly states that his aim is a purely economic analysis of the zones, his neglect of political and social problems such as institutionalized corruption and worker exploitation is regrettable.

This monograph is an important contribution to the processes of economic change in China, a valuable source of primary data for economists, sociologists and development scholars. Although there is already a large body of research literature in this field, this is probably the only in-depth work on the period between 1979 and 1992.
