MAKING POSTWAR LANDSCAPES VISIBLE

Living in the Past and Living in the Future

David Miller

For the past few years, I've been thinking about the future of landscape architecture. I've been thinking about the future of the profession, the future of the field, the future of the discipline. I've been thinking about the future of the landscape, the future of the environment, the future of the world. I've been thinking about the future of the human race.

But I've been thinking about the future of the landscape in a different way. I've been thinking about the future of the landscape as a place of memory, a place of history, a place of identity. I've been thinking about the future of the landscape as a place of meaning, a place of purpose, a place of hope. I've been thinking about the future of the landscape as a place of life, a place of love, a place of light.

I've been thinking about the future of the landscape as a place of beauty, a place of grace, a place of glory. I've been thinking about the future of the landscape as a place of peace, a place of joy, a place of love. I've been thinking about the future of the landscape as a place of life, a place of love, a place of light.

I've been thinking about the future of the landscape as a place of hope, a place of faith, a place of love. I've been thinking about the future of the landscape as a place of life, a place of love, a place of light.
