

Towards Privacy-Preserving Person Re-identification via Person Identify Shift

Shuguang Dou, Xinyang Jiang, Qingsong Zhao, Dongsheng Li, Cairong Zhao

Abstract—Recently privacy concerns of person re-identification (ReID) raise more and more attention and preserving the privacy of the pedestrian images used by ReID methods become essential. De-identification (DeID) methods alleviate the privacy issues by removing the identity-related mean of the ReID data. However, most of the existing DeID methods tend to remove all personal identity-related information and compromise the usability of de-identified data on the ReID task. In this paper, we aim to develop a technique that can achieve a good trade-off between privacy protection and data usability for person ReID. To achieve this, we propose a novel de-identification method specifically designed for person ReID, named Person Identify Shift (PIS). PIS removes the absolute identity in a pedestrian image while preserving the identity relationship between image pairs. By exploiting the interpolation property of variational auto-encoder, PIS shifts each pedestrian image from the current identity to another one with a new identity, resulting in images still preserving the relative identities. Experimental results show that our method has a better trade-off between privacy-preserving and model performance compared to existing de-identification methods and can defend against human and model attacks for data privacy.

I. INTRODUCTION

DUE to the advances in cameras and web technology, it is easy to capture and share large amounts of video surveillance data, which facilitates the research and application of person re-identification (ReID) [1] in recent years. However, ReID has introduced severe concerns about personal privacy. For example, the data collected by ReID pipelines are usually video footage of surveillance cameras in public spaces, which could easily reveal highly confidential information such as daily individual whereabouts or personal activities. Aggregating unauthorized pedestrian data to a central server for the person ReID task may violate the General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) [2].

In this paper, we focus on protecting privacy by removing the identity information from ReID images, namely person de-identification (DeID) [3, 4]. As shown in Fig. 1 (a), DeID aims to remove identifying information about the person with distortion methods like blurring, pixelation, crop, etc. Most of the existing de-identification methods either achieve unsatisfactory privacy protection on ReID data or compromise the ReID performance. Firstly, many of the existing person DeID works remove privacy information from the face region by image distortion methods or generation models [4–6]. However, the face is only one of the recognizable features of the human body; other biological features such as body structure, silhouette, gait, gender, and race could also reveal sensitive personal information. More importantly, although some DeID methods [3, 7] can remove personal information of individuals other than face region features, these methods do not consider the usability of the de-identified data on the ReID task, leading to unsatisfactory ReID performance. It is extremely challenging to achieve a good trade-off between privacy protection and ReID data usability. This is because DeID methods aim to remove all personal identity-related information in each pedestrian image, but the ReID model relies on this removed identity information to conduct training and inference. As a result, we seek to explore: Is it possible to protect privacy without compromising the usability of the data for ReID task?

To resolve this challenging task, the proposed method is inspired by an important observation, which is person ReID models are learned to predict the similarity among pedestrian images, and hence the relationship between pedestrian image pairs (i.e., two images belong to the same identity or not) is much more important than the absolute identity of an image (i.e., who is the person in the image). We propose a method that only removes the absolute or real identity of the images, while still preserving the relationship between image pairs, called person identify shift (PIS). PIS ensures images originally belonging to the same identity still have the same new identity after de-identification. Specifically, as shown in Fig. 1 (b), PIS transforms a set of images with the same identity to a new set of images with a different identity (i.e., identity shift). Inspired by the interpolation ability of variational auto-encoder [8], this transformation is achieved by mixing the original image with several reference images in the latent representation space, leading to a generated image with a mixed identity. In addition, some existing public ReID datasets cannot be released due to privacy concerns. Our work provides a direction to publish the entire dataset after weak encryption by identity shifting, which can facilitate the flow of data and the development and community.

In conclusion, this paper takes one of the first steps toward addressing the challenge of privacy-preserving person re-identification via the following contributions:

- We propose a novel DeID method that achieves good trade-off between privacy protection and data usability for ReID, called Person Identify Shift (PIS), which shifts pedestrians’ original identity to a new identity while preserving the relative identity relationship of image-pairs.
- We conduct detailed experiments to quantify the trade-off between the ReID performance and privacy protection ability to exist data de-identification methods and the
