Situational organized crime prevention in Amsterdam: the administrative approach

Hans Nelen

Introduction

In September 2007, one of the key players in the sex industry in the Amsterdam Red Light District, a man with the nickname Fat Charles, sold 18 of his premises to a housing corporation. The City of Amsterdam is a large shareholder in this corporation. The transaction, valued at 25 million euros, was the final step in a long-lasting procedure of the local authorities to get rid of Fat Charles in this notorious part of the city centre. The brothel-keeper allegedly had been involved in organised crime and money laundering activities for decades but, except for a minor fiscal offence, was never convicted.

Fat Charles was targeted not only by the police and public prosecution department for a large number of years, but was one of the subjects of the administrative approach the city administration had launched in the mid 1990s. As a result of one of the main findings of a criminological study on organised crime in Amsterdam, that indecisiveness of the local authorities had created a fertile breeding ground for illegal and criminal activities in the city, in particular in the Red Light District (Fijnaut et al. 1996), the city administration decided to introduce three interrelated projects:

- First is the eponymous Van Traa Project, named after the former chairman of a parliamentary inquiry into police misconduct. The trailblazer of this project was the Red Light District manager, who was appointed in 1997 at the request of the city council, with the objective of improving the prevention of organised crime in the area.
