MARTINDALE is book nine in Marilyn Clay's popular JULIETTE ABBOTT REGENCY MYSTERY SERIES. When clever young sleuth Miss Juliette Abbott is invited to spend a fortnight at Martindale Manor as companion to a young blind girl whose father has suddenly passed away, she believes she has been offered the perfect respite from murder and mayhem in the tiny hamlet of Martindale in England's far away North Country. Told that the girl's brother and heir, Sir James Martindale, is even now on his way home, Miss Abbott and her trusted maid Tilda set out in high spirits for their four-day journey north. However, upon arriving in Cumbria, Juliette is shocked to learn that the murders have already begun. Miss Martindale's father did not simply pass away; the man was viciously murdered. What's worse, Juliette soon begins to suspect that the late Sir Robert's killer is the very man who arrived at Martindale Manor proclaiming to be the long-lost heir; is not the person he claims to be. Readers will identify the villain at once, but the questions swirling around the hated man's actions remain hidden from view until Miss Abbott bravely takes on the task of ferreting out the reasons why the stranger seems intent upon doing away with any and everyone who dares dispute his claim as heir. Poor blind Miss Martindale is of no help, so it falls to our clever sleuth, Miss Abbott, to keep Miss Martindale's presence a secret from the man claiming to be her brother. Even as the dead bodies pile up, Juliette learns that her name now sits at the top of the ruthless killer's list. Although she summons help, she wonders if her trusted friend Mr. Sheridan will arrive in time to save them all from the killer's trap. A tension-filled page-turner.
