The Excellence of Falsehood Deborah L. Ross, 2014-10-17 The only excellence of falsehood is its resemblance to truth proclaims a clergyman in Charlotte Lennox's The Female Quixote He argues that romances are bad art novels he implies are better This clergyman's remarks repeating what literary and moral authorities had been saying since the late seventeenth century are central to Deborah Ross's discussion of romance characteristics in English women's novels Aphra Behn Delariviere Manley Eliza Haywood Charlotte Lennox Fanny Burney Ann Radcliffe and Jane Austen did not take the clergyman's advice to heart To them the falsehood of romance was by no means self evident nor was the superior excellence of the novel In theory many of them accepted the distinction but their works combined aspects of the romance and the novel in ways that brought them into conflict with the critical establishment The texts discussed here illustrate a process of development both in the novel and in the conditions of women's lives Tensions between romance and realism enabled women writers to question official versions of reality and to measure life against a romance ideal By altering readers' perceptions and judgments these authors gradually altered the reality that novels resemble and set up new combinations of romance and realism for future writers This give and take between fiction and life is seen most dramatically in the way a romantic notion gradually comes to be treated in novels as both real and right Ross follows one such notion that women have matrimonial preferences to the point where romance and reality merge Ross's study brings to light an important part of the history of the novel not yet incorporated in theories and histories of the genre
