

Natural History of the Dislocated Hip in Spastic Cerebral Palsy

Marc Moreau Denis S. Drummond
Eugene Rogala A. Ashworth T. Porter

Introduction

One of the more challenging problems related to the care of spastic cerebral palsy patients is paralytic dislocation of the hip. The incidence of this complication varies widely in the literature. Mathews and associates (1953) found hip dislocations in 2.6 per cent of an ambulatory cerebral-palsy group; Gherlinzoni and Pais (1950) reported an incidence of 4.2 per cent in a similar group. Samilson et al. (1972) reviewed 1013 institutionalized patients, most of whom were unable to walk, and found hip dislocations or subluxations in 28 per cent. Banks and Green (1960) have reported successful prevention of this complication by earlier adductor myotomy and anterior obturator neurectomy, but Phelps (1957) and Baker et al. (1962) have noted that this procedure not infrequently fails to achieve permanent hip stability.

Although most authors agree that this complication should be prevented, the management of the already dislocated hip in a child with spastic cerebral palsy remains controversial, particularly for those children who are severely spastic, bed-bound and neurologically immature. It is generally believed that the untreated dislocated hip in a patient with spastic cerebral palsy will invariably become painful and lead to problems with nursing care and decubitus ulcers. Samilson and associates (1972) found in their institutionalized patients that difficulty with perineal nursing care was a more frequent problem than pain.

We have undertaken this review because uncertainty persists as to whether or not pain and other complications occur frequently following paralytic dislocation of the hip in spastic cerebral palsy. We were particularly interested in the natural history of the untreated dislocation in the more severely involved patients for two reasons: (1) they are the patients most likely to develop this complication; and (2) treating the unstable hip in these patients is frequently difficult.

Methods

We reviewed 88 adult cerebral-palsy patients from two government-run chronic hospitals for the mentally handicapped. All had disabling spastic cerebral palsy, with contractural deformity of both hips. The hospital records were reviewed to obtain details of the patients' IQ, social activity and general health. Each patient underwent a physical examination and the presence or absence of scoliosis, pelvic
