In the article "The Changing Nature of the Modern Warfare," Thornton (2015) discusses how in contemporary environments, warfare happens not only on the battlefield. The central military doctrine of the Western States has been the irregular warfare principle. This approach means that the armies of the states had to become smaller but better equipped and more agile (Thornton, 2015). This is an effective approach when fighting against terrorist organizations, such as Al-Qaeda, the Taliban, or ISIS. However, the current international environment, and especially the recent events, show that the NATO states have to be prepared to fight against not only terrorist organizations but also against states. Moreover, unlike terrorist organizations, which primarily focus on attacks and fights on the battlefield, states such as Russia utilize tools outside of the battlefield to
