Introduction

The German Revolution, also called November Revolution, was a civil war between states in imperial Germany towards the end of World War 1. It began in November 1918 and ended in August 1919 after adopting the Weimar constitution. Factors that contributed to the rebellion included the extreme hardships experienced by the Germans within the four years of the civil conflict. Others included the intensified social upheaval between the bourgeois and aristocratic elite and the general population, and the emotional and economic impacts resulting from the conquer of the German Empire by the Allies.

Key events in the revolution included the creation of a national assembly, the Spartacist uprising, and the Kiel mutiny. The revolt resulted in unprecedented levels of mass mobilization and political violence, including the killing of Karl Liebknecht and Rosa Luxemburg, suppression of strikes, and the Spartacist Uprising. German revolution was driven from below because the pressure from grassroots campaigns against the elites resulted in replacing a federal constitutional monarchy with a democratic parliamentary republic, Weimar Republic. The revolution also led to the fall of the German Empire, the creation of Nazism, and Adolf Hitler rising to power.

End of the German Empire

The German Revolution arose from the German Empire's military defeat in World War 1. Broué argues that the troops' mutiny caused it at the beginning of November 1918. However, that insurgency was widespread throughout the German land without resistance from the older regime. Afterward, it grew into a large movement to oppose the monarchical system. This rebellion prevailed since the working classes united with the military. Moreover, soldiers and workers created councils and assumed naval and political commands. According to Broué, the leading players in the revolution included the Independent Social Democratic Party of Germany (USPD) and the Majority Social
