ABSTRACT

Clinical cytology was originally used by clinicians to provide rapid diagnosis. However, with advancing medical subspecialization, few clinicians interpret cytology themselves these days, for example, gynecologists, hematologists, urologists, and occasional gastroenterologist (mainly in Asian countries). Cytological assessment enjoyed a renaissance with the development of endoscopic ultrasound (EUS)-guided fine-needle aspiration (FNA). Subsequently, pathologists, most of them more experienced in histology, had to take over. Recently, it has been shown that in-room cytology can be easily performed by the endoscopist themselves for initial evaluation of the quality of the EUS-FNA specimen and an initial diagnosis distinguishing benign or malignant cells. Bringing cytology back to the clinician has some advantages but does not substitute the professional cytopathologist. This report has written to lower the threshold for the clinician to find his way back to the microscope, which may improve both their diagnostic yield and assessment of EUS-FNA sample quality.

Key words: Endoscopy, guidelines, histology, intervention, oncology

INTRODUCTION

With the introduction of endoscopic ultrasound (EUS) fine-needle aspiration (FNA) tissue, acquisition from previously inaccessible areas in the body became routinely possible.^[1] According to a German survey, EUS-FNA is mainly used to obtain specimens from enlarged mediastinal and abdominal lymph nodes and from the pancreas.^[2] Furthermore, endoscopists can now take specimens from all areas in proximity of the upper gastrointestinal tract, including liver lesions, left adrenal gland, and spleen.^[3] The EUS-FNA technique has increased the diagnostic potential of EUS enormously, decreasing the number of surgical interventions for diagnostic sampling. With increasing availability of this new sampling method, endoscopists had to train their skills in the preparation of specimens and pathologists had to deal with FNA samples of formerly rarely targeted areas using only cytological preparation and staining methods. Endoscopists as well as pathologists strive to improve the diagnostic processes in obtaining very small samples to increase accuracy for clinical decision-making.^[4-6] Some studies demonstrate that the presence of a cytopathologist in the endoscopy suite might further improve the results.^[7] Rapid on-site evaluation (ROSE) evolved
