design is conceived not merely as an act of creation but as an adaptive process capable of evolving accumulating and layering meaning over time Within this framework the case of the former industrial area of Bagnoli Coroglio emerges as a compelling paradigm encapsulating a long and intricate history of deindustrialization setbacks deferred ambitions and unrealized visions This volume brings together the findings of an interdisciplinary and multiscalar research and teaching initiative conducted across nine design studios translating into territorial strategies spatial visions and project hypotheses for an ecologically attuned and socially conscious regeneration Territories of Co ntr Action thus serves as an invitation to reconsider transformation projects as open adaptive practices endeavors capable of fostering shared pathways of value creation through the collaboration of diverse forms of knowledge communities and institutions
