Special Education Assessment: How and Why It Should Be Conducted

Positive Action Staff• Special Education

Students with disabilities have unique needs alongside their strengths.

Because these students are complex learners, special education teachers must fully understand their strengths and weaknesses before they can be effective with their instruction.

One tool available to these teachers is special education assessment.

It's not just teachers who depend on assessments to identify their students' strengths, weaknesses, and progress, however, parents, specialists, and counselors, too, rely on these assessments.

As a means for systematically collecting and interpreting a wide variety of information, assessments can inform any number of decisions related to:

- Instruction
- Intervention
- Classification
- Placement

Assessment, which is also known as evaluation, may be looked at as a problem-solving process that involves several ways of collecting information about a student for the purpose of making decisions.

For this reason, assessment plays a foundational, if not critical, role in special education.

Expert Tip: Don't confuse the terms "assessment" and "testing." While the two are related, they don't mean the same thing.

Testing refers to the administration of specifically designed and (usually) standardized educational and psychological measures of behavior.

While testing is a part of the assessment process, assessment itself involves several different methods of evaluation; only one of which includes tests.

It's only after a full and individual initial evaluation has been done that a determination can be made as to whether the child has a disability. At this point, the child will be deemed eligible to receive special education and related services.

Thankfully, there are programs such as Positive Action that offer teachers excellent teaching strategies for students with special needs. These strategies, along with an evidence-based SpEd curriculum, can be crucial in helping students thrive.
