Using exhibits they believed they could make systemic issues visual to masses of people. Embedded within these visual displays were messages about individual action. In some cases this meant changing hygienic practices. In other situations this meant taking up action to inform public policy. Reformers and officials hoped that exhibits would energize America's populace to invest in protecting the public's health. Exhibiting Health is an analysis of the logic of the production and the consumption of this technique for popular public health education between 1900 and 1930. It examines the power and limits of using visual displays to support public health initiatives. Catalogue of Exhibits of Insect Enemies of Forests and Forest Products at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, St. Louis, Mo., 1904 Altus Lacy Quaintance, American Association of Economic Entomologists, Andrew Delmar
