Abstract

The high-speed displacement vessels of round-bulge, transom-stern hull form have been widely used for various naval application. Systematic research leading to the better performance prediction of these vessels has been conducted at the Australian Maritime Engineering Cooperative Research Centre (AMECRC). This paper presents the analysis of the calm water experiments of the AMECRC systematic series of high-speed displacement mono-hull forms.

Speed independent regression analysis was performed and two independent sets of regression equations were derived from the same set of experimental data. The regression analysis was developed using a 'classical', multiple linear regression analysis, as well as a novel technique - nonlinear estimation. The nonlinear estimation approach proved to be superior and evaluation of the developed prediction methods has been presented

A unique data presentation method, particularly useful for systematic series data has been illustrated in this paper. It enables single-chart visualisation of multiparameter variations.
