The Reception of Dutch Economic and Political Thought in Europe in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries<sup>1</sup>

MARTINE JULIA VAN ITTERSUM

83

This review article discusses recent publications by David Onnekink, Sophus Reinert, Gijs Rommelse, Jacob Soll, and Arthur Weststeijn from the perspective of the reception of Dutch economic and political thought in seventeenth- and eighteenth-century Europe. The Dutch Republic has been called 'the first modern economy' by Jan de Vries and Ad van der Woude. It looms large in ongoing academic and public policy debates about 'The Great Divergence', i.e. the question why the West made the transition to an industrialized economy around 1800, while China did not. Just how innovative the inhabitants of the Dutch Republic were in nearly all aspects of life is well-documented. Less attention has been paid to the reaction of contemporary Europeans. How did they perceive the Dutch example? What did they learn from it? Was the miracle really mirrored elsewhere? These are questions that deserve more attention than they have received in Dutch historiography hitherto.

In the celebrated phrase of Sir William Temple, the United Provinces were 'the fear of some, the envy of others and the wonder of all their neighbours'.<sup>2</sup> Temple's verdict has been echoed by a wide variety of twentieth-century historians, ranging from Simon Schama and Jonathan Israel to Immanuel Wallerstein and Kenneth Pomeranz. The inhabitants of the United Provinces walked a lonely road in European, even world history. Although threatened by powerful, centralizing monarchies throughout its existence, the United Provinces managed to hold on to its decentralized, republican form of government until the end of the eighteenth century. This, in combination with a thriving print industry and a lack of effective censorship, spawned seeming religious toleration and a rich tradition of republican political thought.
