

MYSTICISM, LANGUAGE AND TRUTH

George Karuvelil*

1. Introduction

Ever since Friedrich Schleiermacher addressed the “cultured despisers” of his time¹ by turning to religious experience, experience has come to occupy a central place (if not the central place) in philosophy of religion. He attempted to show that the truth of religion does not consist in the externals that they despised but in an inner experience. With the linguistic turn of philosophy in the twentieth century, the linguistic dimension of experience came to the forefront. But there is a palpable tension between these linguistic and truth dimensions of religious experience such that any overemphasis on one puts the other in jeopardy. This is clearly seen in the philosophy of Steven Katz who emphasizes language, and thereby putting religious truth at risk. The opposite tendency is seen in Walter Stace. Examining their theories will show that a theory of religious experience, if it is to hold on to both these dimensions, must be such as to make religious experiences logically identifiable and the theory of experience empirically adequate. Together, I shall call them the experiential imperatives.²

I shall not define religious experience since the first principle has to do with the identity of religious experience itself. But this much needs to be said that ‘mysticism’ or ‘mystical experience’ is understood as a class of ‘religious experience’. ‘Identifiability’ is a logico-ontological principle that has come down to us in the form of the famous slogan, “There is no entity without identity” which P. F. Strawson has helpfully explicated as “There is nothing you can sensibly talk about without knowing, at least in principle, how it might be identified.”³ He goes on to say that the principle ²Experiential imperatives involve also a third principle, principle of accessibility, which is not being considered here.
