	Approximation: The government tries to find an equilibrium between cost and quality
	As health care is a public good, it is not subject to the free-rider problem and hence it is supplied
	Insurance contracts are sometimes fair because they are individually self-enforcing in the event of asymmetric information
	Insurance contracts are more likely to be offered to people in particular risk categories
	Healthcare is not sold separately to people with different abilities - health insurance is sold as a pool
	There are policies in place for those who do not have health insurance and are not eligible for a subsidy
	Health insurance is a non-rivalrous good
	Health and safety are external factors in the production of insurance
	Health insurance is sold to people with different abilities, which creates the free-rider problem
	There is no way to avoid asymmetric information in the health insurance market
