

A Practical Guide to Academic Writing and Publishing

John B. Lindsay, University of Guelph

February 2018 (Revision 9)

1.0 Introduction

If you are enrolled in a research-based graduate degree program, you will need to produce a scholarly work, whether that is a thesis, doctoral dissertation, or a series of journal articles. Students frequently find that the academic writing process is one of the most daunting parts of the research process. Effectively communicating your findings is also one of the most important aspects of research. For many students, learning to write in the academic style is marked by a steep and often difficult learning curve.

The following guide is intended to help you with the writing process and is based on my own experiences developing as a publishing scholar as well as from advising graduate students. Please understand that while you may feel that you are an excellent writer, and may well be, academic writing is not like other styles of communication and you have likely received little practice in your undergraduate studies. Truly the best way to become a better academic writer is to read academic papers in vast numbers and to practice. However, I offer the following as a series of explicit goals for which the academic writer should strive as well as a listing of helpful tips. Please note that the informal style of writing in this document is not in itself an example of scholarly writing because that is not the intent.

This document assumes that you aim to publish scholarly work. Even if this is not your intent, it is the standard to which you will be assessed.

2.0 The Pillars of Academic Writing

1. Academic writing must be clear, concise, and terse. Effective academic communication is not English literature. We do not use flowery or overly ornate ways of saying things. Students frequently use redundant phrases in their writing because they feel it sounds more authoritative. The researcher may say, "In order to best target sites for remediation, the model..." The common phrase 'in order to' is redundant and only serves to make the author sound more authoritative. The researcher could easily have stated, "To best target..." instead. There are countless examples of similar ways that writers clutter their work and collectively these errors result in unclear, wordy and therefore less effective communication. Longer is not better in academic writing. It is not a race to a 100+ page thesis. You must be thorough, yes, but not long-winded. Your advisor is not concerned that your thesis is too short. Instead, they're looking for concise and effective reporting of your research. You don't win if you have the longest thesis; you probably need to relay the same concepts more tersely if this is the case.

Handbook for the Academic Physician William C. McGaghie, John J. Frey, 2012-12-06 This book is a bold and useful tool that provides the concepts principles and facts needed to build and to strengthen a career in academic medicine Developing a high level of competency in academia requires the development of skills in addition to those in one's own specialty or discipline One needs skills for conducting research meeting administrative responsibilities and educating students and colleagues These skills are not bells and whistles They are the elements of academic life that make the position truly academic This book provides the critical information needed to succeed in that world Until now many academicians have learned about elements of their job outside their individual discipline by experience and through the observation of role models and mentors In the complex highly competitive rapidly changing world of academic medicine there is no longer time for a prolonged apprenticeship The institution is endangered when individuals are selected for critical posts based upon skills in areas that may not be central to the principal responsibilities of the new position How often one hears He is a great scientist but he runs his department with a shoe box mentality She is a fantastic clinician but she runs a committee as if she knows everything I hate working with her How can a full professor be such a lousy teacher All of the above are symptoms of the need for special skills
