

IV. Designing Experimental Evaluations of Social Programs: The Case of the National JTPA Study

1. Introduction

1.1 The Problem: Can we obtain "reliable" estimates of the impact of social programs such as the manpower training programs of the Job Training Partnership Act (JTPA)?

- Virtually all of these evaluations use nonexperimentally-based statistical methods for estimating the impact of the programs.
- Problem confronted in such analyses is selection bias.
- In the recent literature on program evaluation, several authors have argued that alternative nonexperimental estimators of program impact produce a disconcertingly wide range of estimates even when applied to the same data.

See Table 1.1.

"...estimates of program effects that are based on nonexperimental comparisons can be subject to substantial misspecification uncertainty" (Burtless and Orr, 1986, p. 613)

and that

"...randomized clinical trials are necessary to determine program effects" (Ashenfelter and Card, 1985, p. 648).

Barnow (1987) argues that

"...experiments appear to be the only method available at this time to overcome the limitations of nonexperimental evaluations" (p. 190).

- LaLonde and Maynard (1987) compare the experimental the experimental estimates of the National Supported Work Demonstration impact with estimates obtained using non-experimental procedures and find that:

"the nonexperimental procedures may not accurately estimate the true program impacts. In particular, there does not appear to be any formula [using nonexperimental methods] that researchers can confidently use to replicate the experimental results of the Supported Work Program. In addition, these studies suggest that recently developed methods for constructing comparison groups are no more likely (and arguably less likely) than the econometric procedures to replicate the experimental estimates of the impact of training."

They conclude that these

"findings are further evidence that the current skepticism surrounding the results of

Baker,2000 Despite the billions of dollars spent on development assistance each year there is still very little known about the actual impact of projects on the poor There is broad evidence on the benefits of economic growth investments in human capital and the provision of safety nets for the poor But for a specific program or project in a given country is the intervention producing the intended benefits and what was the overall impact on the population Could the program or project be better designed to achieve the intended outcomes Are resources being spent efficiently These are the types of questions that can only be answered through an impact evaluation an approach which measures the outcomes of a program intervention in isolation of other possible factors This handbook seeks to provide project managers and policy analysts with the tools needed for evaluating project impact It is aimed at readers with a general knowledge of statistics For some of the more in depth statistical methods discussed the reader is referred to the technical literature on the topic Chapter 1 presents an overview of concepts and methods Chapter 2 discusses key steps and related issues to consider in implementation Chapter 3 illustrates various analytical techniques through a case study Chapter 4 includes a discussion of lessons learned from a rich set of good practice evaluations of poverty projects which have been reviewed for this handbook
