

Culture and self

Psychological explanation of culture lays emphasis on learning, problem solving and other behavioural approaches associated with the culture

Jahoda (1984): Culture is a descriptive term that captures not only rules and meanings but also behaviours.

culture is also constituted by the contents of the mind and psyche of the individuals living in the culture. Such subjective and non-material components of culture include attitudes, values, beliefs, ideas, norms, behaviours, etc.

These components are shared across the culture and are expressed in voluntary behaviours, automatic responses and habits of the members, and overall, rituals followed in the culture

Individual differences: Different individuals in a particular culture vary in the degree they carry and follow the cultural values, attitudes, beliefs, norms, behaviours, etc. Therefore, in any culture there are individual differences in observance of cultural values, attitudes, beliefs, norms and behaviours or conformity to culture.

The processes by which we learn, acquire and adopt various aspects of a culture are called as enculturation and acculturation.

Enculturation refers to the process by which various aspects of our own culture are transmitted from one generation to the next by different agencies of the culture.

enculturation occurs in the culture where we are born and the process of familiarisation to the culture begins right after the birth

Acculturation is the process by which a person adapts to, and in many cases adopts, a culture different from the one in which that person was originally enculturated enculturation is smooth and largely an involuntary, automatic and inevitable process. But the process of acculturation often encounters conflicts between the existing cultural learning and the new cultural practices and manners the person is exposed to.

Agents of enculturation are:

1. Parents and siblings (the parental styles, the economic standing of parents, fostering of cultural values, fostering of behaviours that promote self-sufficiency, expectations of the parents on the child,
2. Peer relations (the level of peer interactions, the ages of the peers, gender of the peers)
3. Education (teachers, teaching styles, course content, infrastructure)
4. Religion

Identity: Identity refers to the way individuals understand themselves as part of a social group. It is a universal construct and depends on how we view ourselves and how we are recognized by others.

Identity may be acquired indirectly from parents, peers, and other community members or more directly through enculturation. Example a person may hold multiple identities such as teacher, father, or friend. Each position has its own meanings and expectations that are
