

A Heart for the World, Marcus Braybrooke, O Books, 2005 (ISBN 1-905047-43-6), viii + 142 pp., pb £12.99/$24.95

Marcus Braybrooke has been a pillar of the interfaith movement for many years. His involvement has been deep and dedicated, encompassing a relationship that spreads across the spectrum of interfaith organizations and activities. His presence and his writings have been a source of inspiration to many who have worked with him. This book is the latest of his contributions to the interfaith movement.

It begins on a cautionary note, identifying this time in history as one of opportunity but also of great danger. And this, according to Braybrooke, is partly because religious institutions find it difficult to collaborate, and because of this they fail to speak in a united voice that might carry some weight in political circles. He goes on to charge that in particular, people of faith have not taken a united stand against violence.

Braybrooke contributes the blame for lack of spiritual unity to the attitude of 'exclusivism', by which members of a particular religious tradition claim absolute truth for their beliefs, therefore relegating all other beliefs and traditions to the realm of falsehood. He appeals that 'the time has come for every religion to stop claiming that it is "the one and only" or the "best"' (p. 15).

On the topic of nonviolence Braybrooke is eloquent. He cites examples of the support for violence to be found in many religious scriptures, which are therefore available for the rationalization of violence by anyone who chooses to claim religious justification. He issues a strong call for the religions to reject any violence committed in the name of religion. Recognizing the fact that there are strong conservative elements within religious institutions which oppose interfaith cooperation, he nevertheless provides suggestions and examples of practical ways in which the religions can work together to reduce conflict. Essentially, he indicates that 'The search for a new world order is shaped by shared moral values. It is for the faiths to articulate more clearly and loudly the values that they share and to insist that they are relevant to political and economic life. Indeed unless international society is based on such values, the anarchy, terrorism and suffering in our contemporary world is bound to increase' (p. 45).

One of the greatest values Braybrooke hopes the religions will affirm is concern for the poor. He sees global capitalism as a tool, if used properly, for ameliorating the economic disparities that exist today. He identifies a positive aspect of globalization as being the potential for bringing together the people of the world technologically and
