

Self-Portrait in a Convex Mirror

As Parmigianino did it, ^{with} the right hand
Twice as big as the head, thrusting at the viewer
But turning gracefully away, as though to protect
What it advertises; in an olive-grey room,
A chamber. A ~~seventeenth~~ paneled panes, dark beams,
Fur, crimped muslin, a coral ring run together
In a motion that supports the face, which swims
Toward and away ~~from~~, like the hand. ^{It is} Except that it is in repose. It ^{is} what is protected.
Vasari says: "Francesco one day set himself to take
His own portrait, looking at himself for that purpose
In a convex mirror, such as is used by barbers...
He accordingly caused a ball of wood to be made
By a turner, and having divided it in half and Brought it to the size of the mirror, he set himself
With great art to copy all that he saw in the glass."
Himself, or ~~the~~ reflection of himself, of which The portrait is the reflection, once removed.
The glass chose to reflect only what he saw,
Which was enough for his purposes: his image,
Varnished, embalmed, projected at a 360-degree angle.
It is the time of day or the quality of the light
Adhering to the life that keeps it
Lively and intact in a recurrent wave ^{density?} ~~establishing~~ itself.
Of happening. The soul is its own best customer.
But how far can it swim out through the eyes
And still return safely to its nest? The surface
Of the mirror being convex, the distance increases
Significantly, that is, enough to make the point
That the soul is a captive, treated humanely, no doubt;
The house-arrest is lenient and comfortable,
Occasional outings are allowed, but it is kept
In suspension, unable to proceed much farther
Than your look as you approach the picture. ^{his notice}
Pope Clement and his court were "stupefied"
By it, according to Vasari, and promised a commission
Which never materialized. The soul has to stay where it is Whether or not it is restless, hears raindrops at the pane,
The sighing of autumn leaves swept by the wind,
Longing to be free, out of it, but it must stay
~~Forever~~ in this place, ~~posting~~, moving
As little as possible. This is what the portrait says.
Yet there is in that look a combination
Of tenderness, amusement and regret, so powerful
In its restraint that one cannot look for long.
The secret is too plain. The pity of it smarts,

Swerving
