per year; and, as shown in the third column, among primary health care users, the mean number of primary health care visits per person per year was 1.8.

Of note is the variation in the mean number of primary health care visits across geographic regions. Among all beneficiaries, District 2 (Tallahassee and surrounding areas) had the highest mean number of primary health care visits per person (1.6), whereas District 10 (Ft. Lauderdale) had the fewest (.79). For several districts, the mean number of primary health care visits per person was less than one, suggesting that not everyone in that district had at least one primary health care visit. The districts in the rural areas were generally above the mean for average physician visits. Looking exclusively at those individuals with at least one primary health care visit (Column 3), beneficiaries in District 11 (Miami-Dade) had the highest number of primary health care visits per person per year (2.43) and District 8 (Ft. Myers and surrounding areas) had the fewest (1.40). The number of primary health care visits declined with age, and there was some modest variation across disability group, IQ index, and living arrangement.

Percentage without a primary health care visit. Table 4 shows the percentage of adults with and without a primary health care visit by sociodemographic and clinical characteristics. Overall, just fewer than 40% of the group went without a primary health care visit between 1999 and 2003. The percentage of individuals without a primary health care visit varied considerably across program districts, ranging from a low of 24% in District 3 (Gainesville and surrounding areas) to 52% in District 10 (Broward
