

Martini-Henry Mark I Rifle

The various versions of the Martini-Henry rifles served as the standard shoulder arm of the British Army's infantry and rifle regiments from the mid-1870s until the arms were replaced by the Lee-Metford rifle in the 1890s. The Martini-Henry rifles also were used by the Royal Navy and Royal Marines during this period. In addition, British militia and volunteer units were eventually equipped with the Martini-Henry rifles as production allowed.

Colonial governments acquired Martini-Henry rifles to arm their forces, and the Martini-Henry saw service in nearly every colony that the British had around the world. The Dominion of Canada, as well as the various Australian states, also armed parts of their forces with these rifles.

While all of the Martini-Henry rifles had similar characteristics, there were differences between the various production models. The following chapters will detail these differences.

After extensive testing of several different trials rifles the Mark I Martini-Henry rifle was approved for production
