✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Introduction

Psychosocial or psychiatric rehabilitation of people with mental health problems is a complex process that involves various activities and takes a long time as it can span through one's whole life. Currently, personal recovery-oriented practices are seen as more advantageous for patients than those which are viewed from the clinical perspective (Slade et al., 2014). This shift means that instead of setting particular goals for a patient, rehabilitation facilities and workers are focused on helping patients realize their potential and take on more responsibility in their recovery process. While the previous system valued control over a person's actions and decisions, the current approach takes one's strengths and centers on creating and maintaining a meaningful life for the patient.

In managing such an approach that is strongly connected to developing patients' self-determination and hope, the role of their family becomes less defined. On the one hand, family participation may be presumed to be less significant than before because the individual with a mental illness has to focus on personal capabilities. On the other hand, the family often continues to remain one of the most vital parts of a person's life, which cannot be overlooked in creating a plan for one's successful personal recovery. Therefore, it is necessary to assess the role that family can play in this type of recovery not only to see how it can impact one's mental health but also to find new ways of integrating it into the rehabilitation process.

Self-Determination and Empowerment

In order to evaluate the role of the family in people's rehabilitation, it is essential to review the main principles of personal recovery. First of all, recovery-oriented practices revolve around one's individuality and the uniqueness of every case (Australian Government Department of Health [AGDH], 2010). While previous methods may have been interested in finding a cure or creating a process with a specific end goal, personal

Critical Issues for Future Social Work Practice with Aging Persons Sheila M. Neysmith, 1999 A massive restructuring of health care in virtually all the wealthy nations of the West has offloaded services and costs from governmental responsibility into home care services and onto families a burden borne primarily by women This restructuring has profoundly altered not only the practice of social work but also its representation in language and theory As this volume demonstrates many of the consequences social workers must face are made more difficult by the dominance of a market discourse that excludes a social justice framework The authors aim not to prescribe specific guidelines for practice but to challenge current arrangements and explanations in order to open the discourse and generate alternatives so that people receiving care might have fuller and more satisfying lives Written by social work theorists and specialists from the U S Canada and New Zealand the chapters focus on topics of long term care as they affect vulnerable groups women in particular as they age Subjects include constructing community support aging and caregiving in culturally diverse families changing demographics of widowhood and the new millennium s challenges for social work on aging and disability
