

RIVAL CAVALCADE

In Number One Court, some of so many famous cases, they listened to the trial of two men accused of attempting to murder two police officers by running them down in a van which, it was alleged by the prosecution, had been stolen.

Everybody in Court stood when the Princess arrived, to take their seats behind the baronet's benches. They, in their turn, rose with everybody else when the Lord Chief Justice of England, Lord Goddard, seated in velvet and ermine, came on to the bench. In this place His Majesty's judge took precedence over the King's daughters.

For the first time in their lives, the Princess heard a jury sworn in, the jurors swearing in oath that they would "well and truly try, and true deliverance make, between our Sovereign Lord, the King, and the prisoner at the Bar. . . . And a true verdict give, according to the evidence."

They remained until the mid-day adjournment, listening to prosecuting counsel's outline of the case and to the evidence and cross-examination of witnesses called for the Crown. Watching the slow, relentless working of the law, they seemed deeply impressed.

THURSDAY, MARCH 22, 1940. The King today underwent an operation, known as lumbar sympathectomy, to free the flow of blood to his right foot. Not a dangerous operation, the doctors had said; but there is always some anxiety attaching to any operation. It was a happy duty, therefore, to send out the first bulletin indicating that all was well. "His Majesty's condition," it said, "is entirely satisfactory." The news, flashed round the world in a matter of minutes, was received with relief by millions of people. This morning there was a second of equally reassuring bulletin. The King had a restful day following the operation, and the doctors. Temperature, pulse and respiration had not varied from normal.

Everybody has admired the way in which the King has faced this illness, coping with his desk work all the time, receiving official visitors in audience and holding his investiture last week. Let us hope that we shall see him steadily on the march.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 21, 1940. Another bulletin this morning. Good news again, one was happy to be able to record. The doctors are obviously very satisfied with the progress that the King is making, but they did not return this evening.

A cold, grey day but many people leaving this cheerless March weather to wait outside the Palace, at the railings, for news of the King. What is it that brings them there? Talk to them and you will find that it is not mere curiosity. Respect, affection, sympathy leads them and they wait in the cold and the rain, a quiet and patient crowd of well-wishers.

They cheered the Queen when, in the late afternoon, she drove down the Mall to Marlborough House to have tea with Queen Mary.

FRIDAY, MARCH 23, 1940. To get to Canning Town, you drive through the East End of London; along the interminable length of the Commercial Road, then by way of that romantic-sounding thoroughfare, the East India Dock Road. So, at last, you will come to Canning Town. Twist and turn among the bomb-blinded streets and, where postmen deliver letters marked "London E. 16," you will find the Dockland Settlement which the Duke of Edinburgh visited to-night. That it is not easy to find is clear from the fact that the car from Buckingham Palace lost its way in the side streets.

Meet the grey-haired local reporter and he will be able to recall for you the days when, from two slum houses and a 'in

His Majesty the King.
