

PHYSICS OF A VIOLIN

The violin is the lead instrument in most classical orchestras, and its alter ego the fiddle—which is in fact the same instrument—stars in folk music traditions stretching from the west coast of the Americas through just about every country in Europe and as far east as India.

The violin player creates sound by bowing one or more of the four strings. The bow hairs are rubbed in a sticky substance called rosin in order to make the strings stick to the bow. The action of the bow on the string causes the string to undergo a so-called slip-stick motion, in which the string travels with the bow for a time, and then slips in the other direction before being caught by the bow again a moment later. These oscillations happen many hundreds of times per second—196 times for the low G, which is the lowest note on the violin in standard tuning, and into the thousands for very high notes.
