

the broad scope of the MA. They were selected by peers from the results of an extensive global call for nominations. The basic work is being conducted by four separate working groups: (i) condition and trends; (ii) scenarios – plausible futures; (iii) response options; and (iv) sub-global assessments. Each of these working groups is co-chaired by a natural and a social scientist. The effort is overseen by an assessment panel and a board that represents diverse user groups. The MA is operationally supported by a globally distributed secretariat and is led by a program director. Funding for this complex undertaking is sponsored by the Global Environment Facility, the United Nations Foundation (through UNEP), the Packard Foundation and the World Bank, among other donors. Full details of the organizational structure of the MA are available at <http://www.millenniumassessment.org>.

The challenges

The MA faces several hurdles. One is mining the information available that relates to the delivery of ecosystem services and the tradeoffs that are made by societies in relationship to the usage of these services. In the past, information has been gathered principally about the extent and condition of a given ecosystem state (e.g. biodiversity), but not necessarily about the quantification of the delivery of the services provided. Hopefully, the MA will stimulate more research on the ecosystem state, function and service interrelationships. Another challenge is providing a sufficiently robust foundation so that subsequent assessments can clearly document the status of progress in sustaining the biotic systems upon which we all depend.

Where challenges were anticipated, they have not developed. Working simultaneously at both global and sub-global levels appears successful, at this early stage, although there is a temporal mismatch in the tempo of progress owing to differences in approaches and detail. What has been most gratifying, and a hopeful sign for the future, is the very smooth interaction between the social and natural scientists as the work has progressed. Of course, the full measure of success will become evident as the products of the assessment become available and are adopted to the extent that new policies and viewpoints evolve for sustainably managing our life support systems.

Sexual selection and animal genitalia

Vivian Méndez and Alex Córdoba-Aguilar

Instituto de Ecología, Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México, Apdo. P. 70-275, Circuito Exterior, Ciudad Universitaria, 04510, Coyoacán, Distrito Federal, México

The timely recent review in TREE by Hosken and Stockley [1] highlighted the mechanisms of genital evolution. Central to this paper was the thesis that sexual selection underpins genital evolution. However, two aspects were under-represented in the review, gamete evolution and the roles of females in the evolution of male genital morphology.

After 30 years of study spanning most animal groups [2,3], post-mating sexual selection studies have shown that genital traits are targets of male–male competition and/or female choice. Apart from genitalia, a second set of traits – male sexual cells and accessory fluids – have attracted special attention [3]. For example, sperm properties that are shaped by sexual selection include gamete mobility and morphology, as well as ejaculate size and chemistry. Therefore, when considering the effects of sexual selection on genital traits, reproductive cells and their accessory fluids must be included. Using a hypothetical scenario, if a male with a particular genital morphology is no longer able to remove the sperm stored in a female, he could ‘resolve’ this problem by producing large ejaculates that supersede those of other males. Conversely, females can manipulate ejaculates by changing both their genital features and glandular secretions. Sexual selection is actually acting on both sets of traits and, therefore, not including the two of them in an analysis of genital evolution is misleading.

To have a complete picture of the evolutionary forces affecting form and function of genitalia, it is widely accepted that the interaction of both sexes should be taken into account [4]. It is wrong, for example, to visualize male genital morphology evolution without teasing apart the properties and morphology of the female genitalia. Hosken and Stockley did not emphasize how much can be gained when females are included in this context. For example, a recent study of Drosophila melanogaster

Simmons, 2018-06-28 What is responsible for the differences between the sexes in so many animals from the brilliant plumage of birds of paradise to the antlers on deer And why are the traits that distinguish the sexes sometimes apparently detrimental to survival Even when they look more or less alike why do males and females sometimes behave differently Questions like these have intrigued scientists and the public alike for many years and new discoveries are showing us both how wildly variable the natural world is and how some basic principles can help explain much of that variation Like natural selection sexual selection is a process that results from differential representation of genes in successive generations Under sexual selection however the crucial characteristics that determine whether an individual reproduces depend on sexual competition rather than survival ability This Very Short Introduction considers the history of our understanding of sexual selection from Darwin's key insights to the modern day Considering the investment animals place on reproduction variation in mating systems sexual conflict and the origin of sexual dimorphism Marlene Zuk and Leigh Simmons discuss questions such as whether females can really choose between males on aesthetic grounds and how sexual conflict is resolved in different species They conclude with a consideration of the thorny question of how and even if sexual selection theory applies to humans ABOUT THE SERIES The Very Short Introductions series from Oxford University Press contains hundreds of titles in almost every subject area These pocket sized books are the perfect way
