Abstract

The authors describe a strategic evaluation system for research and development (R&D) in Japan's public research institutes, using examples implemented in the National Institute of Advanced Industrial Science and Technology (AIST). Important issues include promoting coherent and concurrent research on the basis of a strategy to bring about outcomes, and performing the evaluation from the perspective of outcomes in order to develop a clear scenario that might be related to future innovations. © Wiley Periodicals, Inc.

Public research institutes for research and development (R&D) in the field of industrial technology have a special mission to contribute to industrial transformation by developing innovative technologies. This mission differs from that of universities, which are responsible for advanced research and education, and from that of industries, whose products are used practically in society. Although the evaluation indices used by the
